EXAM SAINT

With exams just around the corner, students have borrowed notes, written extra papers, discovered the library, shown up for 8:30 classes, taken make-up tests and all sorts of miraculous things. About the only thing left to do is pray. Only, who do you pray to? St. Anthony is the saint for lost articles--that's only good if you lost your notebook or your term paper. St. Jude is the saint of lost causes--are things really that bad?

Well, there is a patron saint of students--St. Joseph of Cupertino. This man, although he studied, humbly acknowledged that he didn't know everything. Through his faith in God, however, was asked only those questions which he could answer. If you find yourself in a similar situation, here is the prayer to Saint Joseph of Cupertino, Patron saint of students:

Saint Joseph of Cupertino, who while on earth did obtain from God the grace to be asked at his exams only those questions which he knew, obtain for me a like favor in the exam for which I am now studying. In return I promise to make you known and cause your name to be invoked. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

(A word of caution; this will not be of benefit to those who have goofed off all semester or who have slept through classes. Those students are directed to Saint Jude for help.)
